

BIOLOGY 07

Undoubtedly whether the crew is consenting to it or not, their biological pedigree is being modified. No matter how strict and puritan crew members may be to try to maintain an organic type of pedigree, through the air they breath and the food they eat and the people they meet their pedigree will also be contaminated. Also the more nanotechnology advances the more this it is the case. There is therefore no escape from a most likely deviation of human nature in its captivity on board of the modern state-ship.

Arkism does not seek any type of biological purity, to the contrary it seeks to create as much diversity as possible however it defies any type of biological scheme the crew is enforced or persuaded to accept. In order to have its biological pedigree checked the crew is in fact compelled to pay its deed to the pharmaceutical industry providing biological updates just like the updates required by the operating system of a computer. On board of the ship governmental schemes also administrate drugs in order maintain a certain degree of social order which is but the premises of a flourishing capitalistic economy.

There is no deep nor strict sense of any conspiracy theory behind any arkist but just a strong feeling of the very chains that future biological developments will bring about. Along with this dependency no doubt a whole new aristocracy is already on its way, an aristocracy that in its feebleness is most likely to bring the world ships to clash with one another. Literally then arkists are living with whatever means they can, pursuing their lifeboat but certainly having not the luxury to attempt to stay pure and immune from schemes that by now are optional but as every optional innovation it will soon become mandatory.

In a scenario in which arkists are induced by force to assimilate these state-empowering and individuality-diminishing drugs, their very lifeboat practice might in fact save them. The very goal they have in mind to organize a new and libertarian society out of the increasingly authoritarian and life leveling ship may in fact be the antidote not only for them but everyone venturing to conceive it. In arkist terms then lifeboat making is per se providing the way to keep afloat the increasing biological contamination taking place within the sealed compartments of the ship.

By learning to see things for what they are and by learning to process this knowledge without the constant aid of the technological apparatus interconnecting the whole of the crew under the direction of its captains working on behalf of the ship, the arkist is able to pull himself out of a monster. So while the crew members think highly of their independence but are in fact mere unnecessary cells of the monster ship, to become anarkic implies to become a separate and living and autonomous and independent creature from the ship.

There is the ship and there is the arkist. The ship is by now the actual ship, the crew it contains but also the environment it keeps under check with its technological apparatus. There is no other entity than the ship, not even its captains no matter how despotic they may seem. There is only the ship and there can be only a will to break from the ship.

Arkism doesn't solicit for people to pursue a more liberal and irresponsible type of libertine life. It invites people to seriously contemplate hopping off the dangerous and enslaving and nature killing path undertaken by humanity since their more or less involuntary confinement into the ship. In other words there is no extravaganza in building a lifeboat. It is an extreme act to breach into a different and more prosperous and harmonious future.

The future arkism proposes is not a nostalgic look at pre-industrial and pre-feudal realities. It certainly learns from the past but its goal is that of recovering a possibility that modern humanity was ready to pursue but abandoned in favor of authoritarian regimes whether fascists or socialists. These regimes have inevitably constituted the ships in which the whole of humanity had to subscribe to. No human being on the planets is by now left outside of the ship and no square foot of the planet is by now left unmonitored by the ship.

There was a time in which the whole of humanity dreamt about a voluntary type of libertarian socialism enabling each member to fully develop their individuality while also cooperating with the community in a very organic and horizontal fashion. This is the natural setting in which life can thrive and yet the power in the hands of few people fomented by the industry has managed to completely turn upside down these aspirations. By now this humanity of ideals has turned into a regimented crew fully supporting and hailing and voluntarily submitting to the suicide the authority of the ship is leading the whole of nature into.

God is the ship, it is the absolute authority conducting the fate of nature and reducing it to its knees. In all its pride of being atheist and liberal the crew is in fact most obliged to kneel and keep kneeling in front of this new altar, the ship. There is no way to rationalize but only within the strict parameters the ship itself have set as boundaries, boundaries which in fact debilitate any crew member to understand the simple and obvious fact that there is no point in trying to improve the ship so as to solve all the deadly issues it generates. An improved ship will only create newer and more deadlier issues, more divisions and an even more meticulous extinction of the tiny bit of life that is still latent within the environment and the crew.

The more the ship becomes the only authority, the more it devises ways to keep the crew members fully occupied with its administration and/or fully under its narcotics. arkists ought to avoid both. Ought to avoid in the first place to comply to any of the ship's innumerable requirements only passively going along to what it strictly requires them. In this they are just like a stoic trying to remove themselves from any imperialistic duties. Moreover however they ought to keep sane and train himself to deduce the truth from their own objectivity given that now everything on board and surrounding the ship can only be seen as a way to justify its presence.

The arkist lifeboat then becomes the repository of things stripped from any artificial overlay and ready to be used once more for the purpose of setting up a fully libertarian and non-authoritarian community. No matter all the corruption and alteration nature has been subjected to under the authoritarian ship regime, arkism with its arkist is more ready to take the challenge to resume the libertarian project, a very feasible project, the only project that by fully relying on nature's potential, can be long-lasting and fully self-sustainable.
